In 1879 the Indians gave fine quartz specimens to the officers of the man-of-war, Jamestown, and in the following summer a prospecting party was or-ganized by Joseph Juneau and Richard Harris. They camped at the present town site on the 1st of October and then following up Gold creek to the Silver Bow basin, three miles back, found the rich placers and the

When the sun shines, as it has done to-day and for two weeks past, Juneau is as charu ing a little mountain nook as one need seek for. The mountains go so straight up to their 3,000 feet that the little cluster of white houses at the base look as though they might be bits of the lofty snow banks that have tumbled down the feathery cascades to the beach. The site of the mining camp in the Silver Bow basin is even more picturesque, and the trail from Juneau plunges straigh up the mountain side, then down to a second valley, and along the wild canyon of Gold creek and into the basin of the Silver Bow, All the way it leads through dense forests and uxuriant bottom land, where the immense pine trees, the thickets of ferus and devil's club, and the rank undergrowth of bushes and grasses continually excited one's wonder 10, and in the fresh, dewy air and the pure light of the early merning it was a walk through an enchanted forest and a happy valley. The trail wound up to 1,500 feet, dropped by long jumps and slides to the first level of the canyon and reached 1,500 feet above the sea again in the basin. The devil's club, a tall thorny plant, with leaves twelve inches and more across, grew in impassable clumps in the woods, and the sunlight falling on these large leaves gave a tropical look to the forest. The devil's club is the prospector dread, and the thorny sticks used to do to switch witches with in the Indians' old unc vilized days. Echinopaux borrida is the botanist's awful name for it, and that alone is caution enough for one to avoid it. There were thickets of thimble-berried bushes covered with large creamy white blossoms and clusters of white ranueculus, white columbine, blus geranton and yellow mon key flowers grew in patches and dyed the round with their massed colors. The ferns sero everywhere, and under bushes and beside fallen logs delicate maiden hair ferns with fine cleany stems, were gathered by the handful We met a few well-dressed Indians burrying to town and an occasional miner who gave us a cheery greeting.
